An old, old lion knew that he was too tired to hunt for his prey any more. Sadly he went home knowing that soon he would die. But before he lay down, he stopped at the door; breathing with great difficulty and speaking in a low voice, he told the world about his poor health. The news that the lion was very weak was known to every animal in the forest. One by one the animals came to visit him and show their respect. However, when each animal entered his house and came within reach, they fell an easy prey to the lion, who soon grew fat.

One day, early in the morning, the fox came. He was famous for his cunning and came inside the house carefully. "Ah, my dearest friend," said the lion, "is it you? I cannot see you clearly. You are so far away. Please come closer and give me some nice words for I have not long to live." The fox had been looking closely at the ground in front of the lion's place. At last he looked up, turned to go and then said, "I hope you'll get better soon, but excuse me if I do not stay. To be honest, I don't feel comfortable at the many footsteps I see leading into your house, but I don't see any of them emerging. I think I should go now."
